Intervention grouping

Have a clear idea of the groups you want to create and what they're for. Some examples include:

- A unit of work
- A particular foundation skill
- Preparation for an assessment
- Ability groups
- Confidence
- Teams of mixed skill learners.

Intervention groups can be a great way of providing specific students with the tailored learning they need.

You can use this template to plan your groups.

Carousel learning

A round robin or carousel learning lesson can be the perfect tool to address gaps in student groups as well as extend or master certain objectives. Plus, it can give you time to work alongside groups of students to analyze their understanding using informal assessments.

Whether it's a week of carousel learning, or every Thursday afternoon of the week, you can gain some valuable intervention insights.

Use this template to plan your carousel learning, round robin or station rotation system.

Intervention support planning

If you're lucky enough to have a teaching or classroom assistant, keep them informed on what you're planning. If you're planning a unit on time for example, ask them to run informative assessment interventions on who can tell the time and to what level. If you're benchmarking students or prepping for a test, ask them to assess student knowledge so that they can be grouped for further interventions.

Use this template to ensure you can both stay organized.
